PUBLIC HEALTH DEPARTMENT

Public health training is in high demand today due to increasing lifestyle-related or chronic diseases. Through collaboration with diverse stakeholders (communities, policymakers, other providers, etc), health educators and promoters contribute significantly to ensuring an effective public health system. Generally, Health Education and Promotion professionals participate in research, advocate for healthy living, promote evidence-based practices, and support communities to protect and promote health.

Since 1987, the AIAS Public Health Department has offered the Master in Public Health (MPH) degree program. AIAS faculty and student body represent more than 70 different countries. This means that every class has international and multicultural components where public health students can come to know other cultures through first-hand experience. Many public health students pursue double emphases, opening up increased employment opportunities. AIAS MPH focuses on wholeness from scientific and Adventist perspectives and the integration of faith and service as necessary professional competencies.

AIAS Public Health graduates serve the Adventist Church in different capacities and work in prestigious NGOs. Several have continued their education and obtained doctoral degrees from internationally renowned universities.

PROGRAMS OFFERED

MPH – Health Ministry

The Health Ministry emphasis develops Christian leaders who can think scientifically and present the Christian faith in the prevailing scientific culture.
